

Sales Surge at Chick-fil-A

Contributed by Tom McGregor
Wed, Aug 1, 2012, 06:34 PM

The Chick-fil-A fast food chain has recently faced an onslaught of politically correct criticism from Chicago's gay mayor, Rahm Emanuel. The homosexual community opposes Chick-fil-A, since its CEO opposes same-sex marriage. According to the Houston Chronicle, "patrons - jammed into the popular Houston chicken restaurant in Sawyer Heights - said people were asking each other about whether they shared the chain president's views on same-sex marriage or were just hungry."

Apparently on Wednesday, Chick-fil-A's chicken sandwich could have been the most controversial meal to eat. Former Ark. Gov. Mike Huckabee, a Baptist minister, declared it national "Chick-fil-A Appreciation Day," after the chicken chain faced mockery from liberals for the owner's remarks on gay marriage last month. As reported by the Houston Chronicle, "last month, Chick-fil-A president Dan Cathy told the Baptist Press that the Atlanta-based company supported "the biblical definition of family." The stance ignited a gay marriage debate, with LGBT supporters and others lashing out against Chick-fil-A with efforts to boycott or block efforts for the chain to open new stores."

Chick-fil-A customer, Angie Joyce, a Christian, said, "I had never thought about this place being political. It's just a restaurant … This issue is about family values and I want my voice heard like the protestors do."

To read the entire article from the Houston Chronicle, link here:Tmcgregordallas@yahoo.com