

Obama Parody: YouTube Sensation

Contributed by Tom McGregor
Fri, Aug 10, 2012, 06:48 PM

Some college grads feel like scorned lovers of President Barack Obama and now they've scored a sensational YouTube hit with a parody of Goyte's "Somebody That I Used to Know." According to Fox News, the video, which was tracking over 400,000 hits Friday morning, faithfully covers the original, only under the title, "Obama, That I Used to Now." The song begins with, "now and then I think of that Election Day November. When you won, I felt so happy I could die. You can get addicted to a certain kind of message — like this is change we can believe in, yes we can. But college ended had to pay my rent. At least you're the first gay president. But the change I got is that I moved in with my mother." As reported by Fox News, "and the chorus: "Because you won and then you cut me off. Now your speeches never soar as high as unemployment. You took ObamaCare so far, but you left me like a dog strapped on Romney's car." Justin Monticello and Ryan Newbrough co-created the YouTube hit and supported Obama in 2008, but they feel disillusionment that some in their generation are experiencing. To read the entire article from Fox News, link here: tmcgregordallas@yahoo.com