

Gay-Rights Terrorist Targets Family Research Council

Contributed by Tom McGregor
Thu, Aug 16, 2012, 10:54 PM

A gay-rights terrorist launched a shootout at the Conservative-oriented Family Research Council (FRC) and already the Leftist mainstream media is criticizing the shooter's motives. Apparently, President Barack Obama's re-election campaign team continues to strike new lows in gutter attacks against Republicans. According to the Houston Chronicle, "as authorities revealed details about the Family Research Council shooting, the head of the influential conservative organization blamed the attack on "reckless rhetoric," but then delivered his own politically-charged remark, saying critics gave the accused gunman "a license to shoot an unarmed man."

On Thursday, Tony Perkins' remarks sparked anger from Leftist supporters of Obama, because they oppose FRC's opinions over abortion and gay marriage.

As reported by the Houston Chronicle, "Meanwhile, the accused shooter, Floyd Lee Corkins II., was ordered held without bond on accusations he opened fire a day earlier inside the lobby of the council's headquarters. Corkins, whose parents said he strongly supported gay rights, had a backpack full of Chick-fil-A sandwiches and a box of ammunition when he said words to the effect of "I don't like your politics" and shot a security guard, authorities said."

Corkins, 28, has yet to explain why he brought Chick-fil-A sandwiches to the shootout.

To read the entire article from the Houston Chronicle, link here: Tmcgregordallas@yahoo.com