

Polls Show Romney, Obama in Tight Race

Contributed by Tom McGregor
Thu, Sep 20, 2012, 01:49 AM

Despite recent difficulties with GOP nominee Mitt Romney's presidential campaign, he still has a good chance of winning the White House. So it seems that many American voters have lost hope in Obama and could elect a candidate who doesn't inspire them.

According to the Chicago Tribune, "after last month's Republican National convention, a Gallup poll showed President Barack Obama nursing a 1 percentage-point advantage over challenger Mitt Romney while Romney was up 3 points in a Rasmussen poll. CNN had the two even."

Here's another ironic twist. The mainstream media has been hammering Mitt Romney, but in some polls he has inched up. Rasmussen Reports shows that he's now leading in Colorado and New Hampshire.

Perhaps, the Obama media-aligned attack machine is beginning to backfire as American voters feel that Romney criticisms have become too over-the-top.

To read the entire article from the Chicago Tribune, link here: Tmcgregordallas@yahoo.com