GOP Presidential nominee Mitt Romney faced a formidable tag team challenge during his most recent debate. President Barack Obama and his unofficial running mate, CNN TV news anchor Candy Crowley, worked together to get their facts wrong on Libya.

Canada Free Press reports that, "you might think that with all the focus on media bias in debate moderation, Candy Crowley would have minded her p's and q's in last night's presidential debate. But clearly, she doesn't even know the ABC's of her job."

Candy interrupted Romney and blasted him after the Republican asserted that Obama refused to label the Benghazi attack an act of terror when he gave a speech at the Rose Garden on September 12.

According to the Canada Free Press, "the apparent lies surrounding the Libya tragedy are a huge scandal for Obama, and, with the mainstream media's failure to aggressively cover the story, the debate was golden opportunity to get the truth out. Enter Crowley's passion. She snuck into the ring, without Obama even tagging her, and hit Romney from behind with a chair while the ref, Crowley's Brain, was looking the other way. An, as was established later, she was wrong. It was, as Thomas Sowell wrote recently, a display of what Obama himself is guilty of: confident ignorance."
