New York Times's columnist, Paul Krugman, winner of the Nobel Prize for Economics, can call President Barack Obama his number one fan. This would explain why the White House couldn't fix the economy in the last four years.

Paul Krugman praises tax-and-spend government policies and pushes for 'bridges to nowhere' stimulus schemes. He believes that lower taxes are the greatest menace to society and the solution for the EU debt crises is for American taxpayers to bailout bankrupt EU countries.

Apparently, Obama agrees with him too. He even talks about his support for Krugmanism on the campaign trail.

According to Politico, 'President Obama cited liberal New York Times columnist and Nobel Prize-winning economist Paul Krugman as evidence that Mitt Romney's jobs plan didn't add up.'

Obama told a cheering crowd at George Mason University that, 'an economist at the New York Times put it this morning, there's no jobs plan, there's just a snow job on the American people.'

If Obama is trying to win over moderate independent American voters, then the last thing he should be doing is endorsing Paul Krugman's failed economic policies.
