

UN to Deploy Monitors on US Election Day

Contributed by Tom McGregor
Tue, Oct 23, 2012, 07:15 PM

The United Nations would deploy its blue-helmeted troops to act as poll watchers on Election Day. UN officials have already claimed the GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney supports "democratically-mandated torture" and the world's top diplomatic body fears Republicans will stop paying its UN dues. So it's hoping its New World Order Army presence at polls could frighten away GOP voters.

The Hill reports that, "United Nations-affiliated election monitors from Europe and central Asia will be at polling places around the U.S. looking for voter suppression activities by conservative groups, a concern raised by civil rights groups during a meeting this week. The intervention has drawn criticism from a prominent conservative-leaning group combating election fraud."

A UN partner on democratization and human rights projects, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), will deploy 44 observers from its human rights office around the nation on Election Day to monitor activities such as potential disputes at polling places. The strategy is part of a broader observation mission that includes an additional 80 to 90 members of parliament from nearly 30 nations.

According to the Hill, "liberal-leaning civil rights groups met with representatives from the OSCE this week to raise their fears about what they say are systematic efforts to suppress minority voters likely to vote for President Obama."

UN poll watchers come from the countries: France, Serbia, Belarus, Germany, Ukraine and Kazakhstan.

To read the entire article from the Hill, link here: Tmcgregordallas@yahoo.com