In a stunning shocker, even the New York Times is losing hope in President Barack Obama's $1 billion re-election bid. The newspaper has just published an article disclosing that the President often plays host to numerous Muslim radical jihadist groups in the White House.

According to the New York Times, "perhaps the most radical change in US foreign policy under President Obama has occurred here in Egypt, where the Muslim Brotherhood, long shunned as a collection of dangerous Islamist extremists, is now the de facto object of American support."

Meanwhile, the US Consulate in Cairo sponsors jihad summits with ultraconservative Salafist politicians, whom according to the NYT, "make the Muslim Brotherhood seem like moderate pragmatists." Militant Muslims are regular visitors at the US Embassy and act as advisors on Middle East issues for the US State Department.

If Obama gets re-elected, the New York Times asks, "why is this engagement with political Islam, even in Salafist form, confined to Egypt?"
